

Dick Cheney's Halliburton & Nigeria's missing millions

In this exclusive report, we explore how international companies and politicians are Africa's biggest corruption scandal on the back of a $500-billion project

By Richard Attwood and Gavin Hastings in Lagos, Nigeria

Unlike anywhere else in the world, Nigeria is a country where the rich get richer and the poor get poorer. The country's economy is dominated by a few powerful families and a handful of multinational corporations. The rest of the population lives in poverty. The country's infrastructure is crumbling and its government is corrupt. The country's future is uncertain.

The country's economy is dominated by a few powerful families and a handful of multinational corporations. The rest of the population lives in poverty. The country's infrastructure is crumbling and its government is corrupt. The country's future is uncertain.

The country's economy is dominated by a few powerful families and a handful of multinational corporations. The rest of the population lives in poverty. The country's infrastructure is crumbling and its government is corrupt. The country's future is uncertain.

The country's economy is dominated by a few powerful families and a handful of multinational corporations. The rest of the population lives in poverty. The country's infrastructure is crumbling and its government is corrupt. The country's future is uncertain.

The country's economy is dominated by a few powerful families and a handful of multinational corporations. The rest of the population lives in poverty. The country's infrastructure is crumbling and its government is corrupt. The country's future is uncertain.

The country's economy is dominated by a few powerful families and a handful of multinational corporations. The rest of the population lives in poverty. The country's infrastructure is crumbling and its government is corrupt. The country's future is uncertain.

The country's economy is dominated by a few powerful families and a handful of multinational corporations. The rest of the population lives in poverty. The country's infrastructure is crumbling and its government is corrupt. The country's future is uncertain.

The country's economy is dominated by a few powerful families and a handful of multinational corporations. The rest of the population lives in poverty. The country's infrastructure is crumbling and its government is corrupt. The country's future is uncertain.

The country's economy is dominated by a few powerful families and a handful of multinational corporations. The rest of the population lives in poverty. The country's infrastructure is crumbling and its government is corrupt. The country's future is uncertain.

