

Browder's claim of "use of batons," backed by fake document.

From Browder's website, in Russian:

government to be filled out and provide an explanation and justification for incidents in which a prisoner is subjected to the "special means" of being handcuffed. Apart from not mentioning batons or saying anything about Magnitsky being beaten, it explicitly states that he was placed in handcuffs, not as the story Browder claims it corroborates says, in order to harm him, but instead out of concern that he would harm himself.

Moreover, this accords exactly with what's said in The Moscow Public Oversight Commission report. It tells us that, on the night he died, Magnitsky began to act very erratically, the doctor thought his behavior "looked like acute psychosis and delirium of persecution," so "[t]hey called for psychiatric emergency" and "[t]hey put handcuffs on Magnitsky's hands."
