

When a user logs into a system through a computer, the user is usually required to provide a password. This password is used to verify the user's identity. The password is usually a string of characters that is unique to the user.

One of the most common methods for storing passwords is to store them in a database. This method is usually used for systems that have a large number of users.

Learn more about password storage methods \(https://www.owasp.org/index.php/Password_Storage_Methods\)

